

The reputation Curtis achieved in the community was meaningful because of the confidence people had in his judgement and his commitment to community affairs. He had a forthright personality born of a strong will and strong convictions. He was a friendly outgoing person who was ready to help his extended family and friends with whatever their needs were. His stories and anecdotes were fascinating. He loved playing bridge and telling jokes. He laughed easily and his easy bantering style wore well with people.